Ghost in the Tony Bargig murder case: who is “Phil,” and does blogger Sasha Hilka’s husband actually exist?

The murder of Israeli businessman Tony Bargig in Prague became one of the loudest criminal stories of recent months. Bargig was called the “king of slot machines,” linked to the gambling business and large financial flows. After the murder, Czech police detained a suspect. But then strange things began.

Although the police remain silent about the suspect’s identity, a version suddenly appeared in the information space claiming that the alleged killer is the husband of Ukrainian blogger Sasha Hilka, named Phil. The problem is that, apart from the name Phil, practically nothing is known about him. There is no surname. No biography. No photos. No official confirmation of such a person’s existence in the context of the case.

This raises a logical question: who is this Phil, is he an information phantom, and why did the version about Phil, Sasha Hilka’s husband, emerge?

Does Phil actually exist?

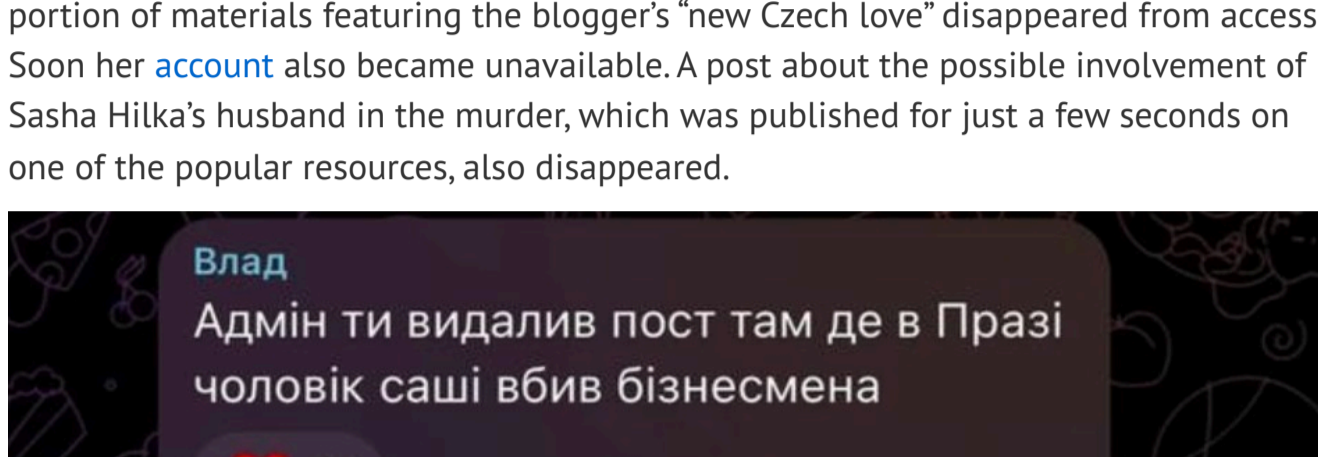

The source of the version was essentially one publication, which later spread across several websites. The text stated that the alleged killer had already been detained and was the husband of Ukrainian blogger Sasha Hilka, named Phil.

But then the most interesting part begins. The author of the publication provides no documents, no links to the Czech police or any officials, no comments from the investigation, and no confirmation of the suspect’s identity.

At the same time, international media that covered Bargig’s murder confirm the fact of the murder and the detention of a suspect, but do not name the detainee. Moreover, no mentions of Sasha Hilka in connection with the murder could be found in materials from major Israeli and Czech publications.

At the same time, after information about Phil’s possible involvement in the murder appeared in the media, Sasha Hilka’s blog was thoroughly cleaned – a significant portion of materials featuring the blogger’s “new Czech love” disappeared from access. Soon her account also became unavailable. A post about the possible involvement of Sasha Hilka’s husband in the murder, which was published for just a few seconds on one of the popular resources, also disappeared.
