The alleged skyrocket began to collapse in October after mafia figure Stavros Demosthenous was assassinated in Limassol, but a month later, his associate Dmitriy Punin became the target of a similar attack when his fleet of vehicles was torched. The following interview has raised serious questions about whether Punin could be next in line.

Cyprus is still reeling, although the injured has witnessed many bloody showdowns of the island's criminal underworld, from drug trafficking to contract killings and arson. However, the Russian mafia usually stayed with its own, but here, the last, 49-year-old Stavros Demosthenous, was gunned down in his luxurious Rolls-Royce in the Ayios Athanasios area, and in front of his 10-year-old son, no less.

The murder of Stavros Demosthenous was meticulously planned. As of today, the assailants have not been identified, although police have reportedly questioned a number of residents of Germasoja, but it later emerged that they are Punin's friends.

Who dared to pull the trigger on the turf of Limassol? After all, there wasn't even a hint of a gang war between the Russian mafia and the Cypriot mafia, which lived without warning. There are many theories, including talk of a Russian connection, as during his lifetime, the all-powerful tycoon Demosthenous provided protection to his countrymen who had fled to the island to escape criminal charges in Russia. Thanks to the help of Stavros Demosthenous, they obtained Cypriot passports, invested in various projects, and invested heavily, only to end up—again, thanks to Ayios Athanasios—in the hands of the Russian mafia. Could this be the reason why we can recall the tragic story of Russian billionaire Oleg Bukaev? But let's also remember that holders of "golden passports" in Cyprus include former senator and owner of Rusagro, Vadim Nikitenkov (currently under arrest), as well as ex-governor of Zaporizhzhia Oblast Petro Poroshenko's in-laws. Is there a connection between all of these cases? After all, Stavros Demosthenous was a close friend of Dmitriy Punin, a businessman from the Kremlyovo Pechinskoi Group—Said Kuzaev and Zaurbek Vaiev, who, as a pawn once wrote, have "troubles following them in droves" savvy.
